Migration due to international climate crisis, income inequality, systemic violence and seasonal work is an increasingly pronounced problem across the globe. The Central American region has historically been one of the most troubled by this phenomenon, its proximity to the United States of America has caused millions of workers to migrate year after year in search of a better future and sustenance for their families. Exposure to human traffickers, extreme weather conditions and legal defenselessness has always been a constant for them. However, the arrival of new nationalist-conservative governments in the region, as well as a return to nativism by the US, have aggravated the persecution and abuses on the human rights of immigrants.

That is why from the International Union of Socialist Youth (IUSY) we call on the governments of the region to find joint solutions to this shared situation. They should not share the repressive and persecutory policies of immigrants of the Donald Trump government. We are concerned about the use of the National Guard on the border between Mexico and Guatemala, as well as the bilateral agreements between Honduras and the US; and Guatemala and the US. The governments of the region must guarantee the right to free transit in the region, as well as the identity of each person, for which it is imperative to issue identification cards to the members of the various migrant caravans that cross these countries in its transit to the north of the continent.
