Climate justice means that those most responsible for the climate crisis must also carry the greatest responsibility for solving it. IUSY believes that the countries and industries that have historically contributed most to global emissions must lead the way, both politically and financially, in driving the green transition. They must not only pay for the consequences of the crisis but also invest in the reforms needed to prevent it. A just and sustainable future requires global solidarity, structural change, and clear accountability.

Therefore, we propose that:

- IUSY calls for increased international subsidies for farmers who wish to transition to plant-based agriculture.
- IUSY supports the introduction of mandatory carbon footprint labeling on food products.
- IUSY calls for the phase-out of all energy production dependent on coal, fossil gas, and oil by no later than 2040.
- IUSY supports a significant increase in funding from the countries contributing the most to the climate crises, to green energy research and innovations.
- IUSY calls for the immediate implementation of climate tariffs on imported goods based on their climate impact.
- IUSY calls for fair and sustainable global extraction and use of rare earth elements, with support for domestic production where possible.
